The Penn-York Humanitarian Affairs Internship is an opportunity for learning about the approaches to humanitarian efforts and how to improve policy and practice at a global scale. This internship is a combination of work, research and service. There is a primary focus on healthcare in humanitarian affairs and how to bring a community together, with a direct application through service at a local refugee clinic in York, England. There will be thorough involvement with mentors at the University of York, to facilitate deeper understanding through discussions, one-on-one meetings, teaching sessions and research assignments. The goal will be to gain knowledge on humanitarian responses, health delivery, and psychological perspectives of patients.
